Simplify business usage

I REFER to the article, "KISS (keep it short and simple) the big words goodbye" (ST, July 3). I am glad to see the Government encouraging people to speak English using short and simple sentences.

I hope that it can also embark on a similar effort to make business and legal documents easier to understand. The long-winded and confusing — but legally binding — sentences used in business and legal documents result in most people signing on the dotted line without reading them.

Examples include flat or house title deeds, insurance-policy agreements, company reports, banking and credit-card agreements and software licensing agreements.
